The peers killed Aa for the fa the bill but, in 1733, both houses passed the molasses act. This disguised the real in-tention of destroying the commerce in question by laying prohibitory duties on sugar, molasses, and rum imported from foreign plantations, especially the French West Indies, into any of the English colonies, and extending certain privileges to the sugar trade of the English islands. The act was unmistakably ill-advised. The colonists had to evade either the molas-ses act or the statutes prohibiting manufactures; they followed the path of minimum resistance and maxi-mum profit; in the period now under consideration,...
