Excerpt: . . . and to fit them for work in that station of life which it had pleased their Heavenly Father to place them. These objects were accomplished; dissent and social equality were made objectionable in many eyes, the Church retained its hold on the masses of the poor, which seemed to be drifting from them, and the condition of many laboring men was raised and brightened. The schools have been partly merged into the national-schools system, have partly died, and the remainder have reached the stature of secondary schools and still exist. Thus it has come to pass that through the efforts, mainly of individual founders animated by religious; zeal, England has been supplied with about three thousand endowed schools, which, had they been prop-i erly nursed and developed and rightly distributed, would probably have been almost sufficient to provide secondary education for the nation. But...
