With our very large and rapidly-increasing population, we are solely dependent on the sea for the bulk not only of the raw material which is essential to our manufactures and trade, but also of our supplies of food. Scarcely one-third of the wheat which is consumed in this country is grown at home; the rest is imported from abroad. Therefore, in the possible event of our fleets being defeated, the British Channel would fall into the possession of the enemy, and would thus be closed to the entry of our supplies. A very few weeks would suffice to produce a famine throughout the country, and we should be starved into making an ignominious treaty of peace with the enemy upon their own terms. If this consideration stood alone, it would conclusively prove...

Reviews

This publication may be really worth a go through, and a lot better than other. It really is written in simple terms and never difficult to understand. Once you begin to read the book, it is extremely difficult to leave it before concluding.
